This free workshop led by Joe Brummer, aims to share skills and tools with parents for handling discipline and behavior, while building connection, based on the principles and tenants of restorative practices. Along with practical skills and tools, this workshops is meant to help parents, teachers, and those working with youth shift away from punitive measures of discipline to more restorative methods. It includes conflict and communication skills based on Marshall Rosenberg’s powerful theory of Nonviolent Communication. Additionally, our hope is to build a community of support for parents around these tools. Sponsored by The Community Foundation of Greater New Haven. For more info: thisiswhatitlookslike.info

Joe Brummer has been studying ahimsa (nonviolence) through mediation, Nonviolent Communication, and restorative practices for the last ten years as his personal response to being the survivor of two serious violent crimes. He has worked with youth and adults in a multitude of settings from peer mediation in schools to state employees to corporate fortune 500 companies.
